FOREWORD

In April 2014, India became the first country in the world to have statutorily mandated Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR) for certain companies to comply with the provisions relevant to CSR. India, with its comprehensive CSR framework, has established a standard for achieving sustainability objectives and promoting stakeholder engagement for societal impact.

ICMR, being the apex body in India for formulation and coordination of biomedical research through Intramural and Extramural research activities, is mandated to foster development and acceleration of medical countermeasures to address public health challenges as per national health priorities. In alignment with the mandate that CSR funds should be allocated for activities with widespread public benefits through public-private partnerships, ICMR has been instrumental in advancing this initiative with utmost intent and spirit.

The "ICMR Guidelines for Utilization of Corporate Social Responsibility" will ensure effective utilization of CSR funds in accordance with the CSR objectives as outlined in Schedule VII of the Companies Act, 2013. These funds, generated from industry donations, will be directed towards supporting the research of national health importance not provisioned under Intramural and Extramural Grants of ICMR, thereby fostering innovative research to address critical health challenges. Key areas include the development and delivery of vital health technologies such as vaccines, therapeutics, devices, and diagnostics. By backing pre-clinical and clinical evaluations, ICMR strives to accelerate the delivery of advanced healthcare solutions to the public. The guidelines also highlight mechanisms to support validation of promising technologies and imparting training in medical and biomedical research, for ensuring development of skilled workforce capable of addressing emerging health needs. Additionally, these guidelines provide flexibility to address other national health priorities as may be realized due to evolving healthcare needs, ensuring that CSR contributions adapt to evolving health needs.

These Guidelines are forward looking and are based on experiential learnings. I would like to express my commendation for the dedication demonstrated by the ICMR team, particularly the Medical Device and Diagnostics Mission Secretariat (MDMS) under the Division of Development Research, for their diligent efforts in developing these guidelines that will foster the culture of innovation through public-private partnerships leading to improved public health outcomes.
